

I believe that you should increase the compensation for denied boarding because of overbooking to the maximum allowed, and, certainly not less than the value of the fully priced round trip ticket. The airlines should not be allowed to use vouchers as enticement for "voluntary" accepting of a later trip. That just allows the airlines to use cheap valued vouchers instead of real cash. These vouchers require that the person fly in the future on the offending airline, and, at their terms. That is nonsense. There are some airlines that I would love not to ever have to fly again, but am forced to do so because of restricted destination competition. I have been offered voucher compensation which I would rather tear up than use. Money is the only thing which will get the airlines' attention. Help us poor consumers, please.