

Your document is marginally intelligible to the average airline user, but I think I know what you have in mind. I think that peak-rate pricing would be an effective way to discipline airlines. The claim is that customers demand flights at those peak times, so airlines must accommodate those demands. But in fact the flights do not leave at the peak times, because they are frequently delayed. So why not face reality, and schedule them when they can actually depart?